RQ-170
Unfortunately, she was eliminated in favor of the A-10, and was used by NASA for a bit before being quickly decomissioned, therefore she does not have any combat experience.

Anyan's comments:

The YA-9 has been introduced. In the A-X, the Air Forces' attack aircraft development program, the YA-9 competed with the A-10, though in the end she was eliminated for poor scores in survivability, most notably because of the engine being in the bottom and there being only one vertical stabilizer.

The unfortunate F-20 Tigershark has also been added. It's notorious for being more known through Area 88 than through real life news, QQ.

I finally got around to doing one about the Zhuhai air show. I just put her down as the FC-31, but I am considering switching the name to J-31.

During the November test flights, it was pretty notable that the FC-31 was spewing so much black smoke and soot. The J79 engine of the F-4 also does not burn clean.

The T-50B [TL note: a Korean supersonic trainer/light attack aircraft recently developed; it's going through the rounds to be sold to countries with outdated aircraft] was supposed to do a show, but Lockheed-Martin was worried about the Chinese officials snooping the T-50B and leaking technology and did not approve it being transported to China; therefore the Black Eagles' Chinese airshow was abandoned.
